New Hints Seen That Red Wine May Slow Aging

By NICHOLAS WISE
Published June 6, 2006

Red wine may be much more potent than was thought in extending human lifespan, researchers say in a new report that is likely to give impetus to the rapidly growing search for longevity drugs.

The study is based on drinking wine with resveratrol, an ingredient of some red wines. Some scientists are already taking resveratrol in capsule form, but others believe it is far too early to take the drug, especially since wine is its source, until there is better data on its

Mounting evidence shows red wine antioxidant kills cancer

Mar 25, 2006

Rochester researchers showed for the first time that a natural antioxidant found in grape skins and red wine can help destroy pancreatic cancer cells by reaching the cells’ energy source, or mitochondria, and stopping it from functioning. The study is published in the latest edition of the journal, Antioxidants in Environmental Medicine and Biology.

The study also showed that when the pancreatic cancer cells were slightly damaged — pre-treated with the antioxidant, resveratrol, and irradiated — the combination induced a type of cell death called apoptosis, an important form of cancer therapy.

Although red wine consumption during chemotherapy or radiation treatment has not been well studied, it is not "contraindicated," Olmoff said. In other words, it is not harmful to drink red wine moderately, most physicians would not tell the patient to give it up during treatment. Perhaps a better choice, Olmoff said, would be to drink as much red or purple grape juice as desired.

Yet despite widespread interest in antioxidants, some physicians are concerned antioxidants might end up protecting tumors. Olmoff's study showed there is little evidence to support that fear. In fact, the research suggests resveratrol not only reached its intended target, blocking the growth of malignant cells, but at the same time protected normal tissue from the harmful effects of radiation.
